Those who choose to employ technology as a helpful device are way ahead of those who feel it's the key to their success.

Email, instant messaging, texting, social media, cell phones...

How many ways are you connected to the world? Odds are, you use nearly all of these tools...and that can be great. Conversely, it can also be far less than good.

Ever find yourself sitting at a family event doing emails? Checking the cell phone when you go to the restroom?

Technology is an asset that can quickly become a liability. Take time to sincerely think about how much connectivity you employ, and more importantly, when you do it. Somewhere along the way you owe it to yourself and your family to experience "down time".

Give yourself permission to not be enslaved by communications technology. See these items as tools, not a way of life.

Ponder This...

If I'm a technology junkie, should I be upset with my employees if they are too?
